Oluwafunmbi Akinmulero
PwC Nigeria

Dear Ms Akinmulero,

Chief Executive Officer, Private Sector Health Alliance of Nigeria

I would like to be considered for the PSHAN chief executive role. My CV is attached.

I have spent sixteen years running health facilities, mostly ones that were not working when I got there. Cedarcrest in Abuja was the last of them. We took it past a billion naira a month, the best year in its history. Before that I was chief innovation and strategy officer at Evercare Lekki, where I cut $1.1M of cost without losing volume and put revenue up 23% in a quarter. And I built Doctoora, which reached 21 states without building a single facility, then sold it to Evercare.

PSHAN has already won the hard argument. 800,000 people reached, utilisation up more than tenfold, no maternal deaths and no stockouts on the programme. Not many people in Nigerian health can show you numbers like that.

What I would worry about is year three. A company adopts a centre, the refurbishment is done, the ribbon is cut, and then the budget cycle turns and the CSR line moves on. 774 LGAs means 774 small businesses that each have to earn their keep. Opening them is a mobilisation problem and PSHAN has solved it. Keeping them open is an operating problem, and that is my work.

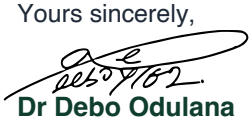
I have done it at this level too, which a CV full of hospital names hides. At Doctoora we ran a subscription primary care service in a riverine community you cannot drive to, and built a clinic for five thousand traders with their own association paying in. Neither was charity and neither fell over when the launch money ran out. I would also want to test whether Evercare Advantage, which I designed, can be pointed at ADHFP. We took over facilities we did not own and put in no capital. From outside, the scarce input at these centres looks like management rather than money.

The ground has moved as well. Between the SWAp and the renewal investment programme there is now a federal mechanism with state money behind it. Dr Muntaqa Umar-Sadiq, who established PSHAN and now coordinates SWAp, has been a friend and a mentor of mine for years. PSHAN's facilities should be counted inside that architecture, not alongside it.

On money, I have raised it, built a company and sold it, and I hold a fundraising mandate in Lagos that pays me only on what is actually raised. I know the donor side from the inside, having reported to a development finance fund at Evercare. And through the Doctors Foundation for Care, which I lead, the NESG Health Policy Commission and the Healthcare Federation of Nigeria, I am in regular contact with the global partners and the Nigerian funders working here. I would not be starting that network from scratch.

MBBS, MSc from Imperial, full MDCN registration. I live in Lagos. I would be glad to talk, and to come in and go through the first hundred days properly.

Yours sincerely,



Dr Debo Odulana
